

One night. One vote. One founder asking himself what he was really building.

Aaron Price built Ethos Tech to keep a promise he made at sixteen, standing at his sister's cremation: that no family would ever stand helpless again while the data that could have saved them sat in silos.

Five years later, the company is real, the algorithms work, and a hedge fund predator is about to call the vote that will sell it for parts. The board has turned. Aaron's co-founder has turned. His mentor has turned. The shareholder meeting is at 9 a.m.

Then Chris arrives — silent investor, mysterious advisor — to drive Aaron away from the chaos and back toward the only question that matters: when the spreadsheet asks you to compromise everything you love, what do you do?

Over eighteen hours, Aaron will discover what kind of leader he is willing to be.
